PART I: ACCESS TO INFORMATION FROM WRITTEN TEXTS (70 points)

Read the article below and then answer questions 1-8.

OUTDOOR SCIENCE

On most sunny winter weekends, college student Erika Dunn goes skiing high in the Rocky Mountains. Last weekend, however, she volunteered to track wolves through those same mountains for a research project she had read about on the website of an organization called Adventurers and Scientists for Conservation (ASC). Founded in 2010 by hiker and ecologist Gregg Treinish, the ASC connects adventurers and outdoor sports lovers with scientists who need help in getting information from places that are hard to reach.

By establishing the ASC, says Treinish, he hoped to solve a serious problem in conservation research: scientists who study endangered plants and animals are often unable to get data from remote regions. Treinish believed that adventurous nature lovers would be happy to help out, and he was right. Shortly after the ASC website started listing research projects that needed data, adventurers – hikers, divers, and mountaineers – began offering to get it. Volunteers have already collected information on five continents and in every ocean on the planet. They've even found a previously unknown plant growing high on Mount Everest.

Working with volunteers means that scientists don't have to finance expeditions out of their own limited research budgets, says Tom Harrington of the Brandon Research Institute. But relying on non-scientists for help can also be problematic. In one project, for instance, biologist Debra Cusack asked 12 volunteers to gather data on the pika, a small animal that lives in mountainous areas. When she checked the data they sent, she found that much of it had no value for her study: some people got confused when using the tracking equipment; others sent images of a different animal altogether. Nevertheless, Cusack plans to continue working with volunteers. "A little usable information is better than no information at all," she says.

The ASC is also thinking of the next generation, and is working to increase teenagers' awareness and knowledge of the natural world. In one program, high school students are taken to local parks and shown how to make observations of scientific value and how to record the information accurately. "We're giving teenagers a 'cool' way to spend their time outdoors," says ASC instructor Henry Dyson, "and also teaching them skills that will allow them to make a real contribution to the world we live in."
